white stuff. It made the trees and ground sparkle. It meant snowball fights, snowmen, and best of all sledding. She'd even gotten a new sled for Christmas. But what good was a new sled without snow?

She pulled her sled out from under the tree. It still had a big red bow on it. "All I really wanted for Christmas was a new sled. But now that I have it, I can't even use it. This is turning out to be the worst winter ever."

Her father patted her shoulder. "There's still plenty of time for snow, sweetie. Winter's only just begun. Give it time and the snow will come."

"Yeah, but winter break will be over soon, and I haven't gotten to use my sled yet."

“What about all your other Christmas gifts? Why don’t you play with them? I bet you’ll have so much fun you won’t even miss the snow.”

Arianna sighed. Her father just didn’t understand. She grabbed her sled and moved it to the middle of the living room floor.

“What are you doing?” her father asked.

“A snow dance,” Arianna said, marching around the sled. She raised her hands in the air and chanted, “Snow, snow, snow.”

Her father laughed but Arianna kept dancing and chanting. She did her snow dance for three straight days before she gave up. She went to bed that night without even checking the weather report.

In the morning she woke up to something lying next to her in bed.
