Transitive Verbs and Direct Objects

A transitive verb is an action verb that takes a direct object. The direct object tells us who or what receives the action. Direct objects are nouns or pronouns.

Example: Phoebe opened the can of orange soda.

The subject is Phoebe. The transitive verb is opened. The direct object is can.

Underline the transitive verb and circle the direct object in each sentence. Be careful not to mistake objects of the preposition for direct objects.

1. Long ago, people used a detached opener for soda cans.

5. People sometimes injured themselves on the sharp edges of the opened can.

6. Ernie Fraze improved his design.

7. He added a removable tab to the top of the can.

8. Unfortunately, people littered the ground with the removable tabs.

9. In 1977, Mr. Fraze patented a tab that pushed in and folded back.

10. We still use this type of tab on our drink cans today.
A transitive verb is an action verb that takes a direct object. The direct object tells us who or what receives the action. Direct objects are nouns or pronouns.

example: Phoebe opened the can of orange soda.

The subject is Phoebe. The transitive verb is opened. The direct object is can.

Underline the transitive verb and circle the direct object in each sentence. Be careful not to mistake objects of the preposition for direct objects.

1. Long ago, people used a detached opener for soda cans.
2. One day, Ernie was thirsty, but he forgot his special opener.
3. Clever Mr. Fraze used a car bumper to open the drink.
4. In 1959, he invented a can with an attached lever.
5. People sometimes injured themselves on the sharp edges of the opened can.
6. Ernie Fraze improved his design.
7. He added a removable tab to the top of the can.
8. Unfortunately, people littered the ground with the removable tabs.
9. In 1977, Mr. Fraze patented a tab that pushed in and folded back.
10. We still use this type of tab on our drink cans today.