Jezzabelle's Old School

by Neal Levin

It was Jezzabelle's first day at her new school. She didn't like it one bit.

Everyone was in groups. They ate lunch together. They played on teams.

"At my old school, we didn't say the Pledge," Jezzabelle told Hannah at recess. "We sang 'Old McDonald' instead."

Hannah looked at her like she had marshmallows for brains.

"At my old school, if you didn't want to take a spelling test, you could do jumping jacks instead." She did three jumping jacks to show her.

"That's silly," Hannah said.

"At my old school, I was better than everyone else." Jezzabelle counted on her fingertips. "I was the best in science. I was the best in art. In fact, I was the best in everything."

"You're fibbing, Jezzabelle! Nobody can be the best in everything."

"You weren't at my old school!" Jezzabelle cried. "At my old school, people weren't mean to me, either."

It was true. None of the kids at her old school were mean to her. None of them yelled at her. In fact, they hardly talked to her at all.

"If your old school was so great, why don't you go back there?" Hannah said.

"At my old school," Jezzabelle said quietly, "I didn't have any friends." She turned away so Hannah wouldn't see her teardrops. "I can tell you don't want to be my friend either. Just like at my old school."

She knew what would happen now. Hannah would ignore her too.

"Wait," Hannah said. "I never said I don't want to be friends. I just don't like it when people..."

"Stretch the truth?" Jezzabelle said.

Hannah nodded.

"Well, maybe I can shrink it back," Jezzabelle said. "Want to know what we really did at my old school? Every Friday we had a poetry contest. The winner got to take the hamster home for the weekend."

"That sounds fun," said Hannah. "Let's suggest it to Mrs. Andrews."

Jezzabelle smiled.

Here at her new school people might act differently.

Starting with Jezzabelle herself.
