Remembering the Fallen

by Kelly Hashway

John walked through the park with his mom. It was their favorite way to spend a Saturday morning. They'd feed the birds and have a picnic brunch. But today, their usual picnic spot was already taken. They continued walking, looking for a good place to eat. John's stomach rumbled as he approached a statue of a man kneeling in front of a pair of boots, a rifle, and a helmet. "What is this a statue of?"

"It's a memorial for a fallen soldier." Mom's eyes glistened with tears as she stared at the statue. "When I was a little girl, Grandma and Grandpa used to take me here every Memorial Day. The whole town would get together and remember those who'd been lost."

"That sounds really sad," John said.

"Actually, it made people feel better. Sometimes talking about a loss helps us heal. And remembering those who died for us is a great way to honor them."

"Like with this statue?"

Mom nodded.

"Did you used to attend the memorials, too?" Mom asked.

The woman nodded. "I ran them. That woman you were just talking about is me."

"Why did you stop the memorial services if they were helping so many people?" John asked.

"I got very sick for a while. I'd hoped someone else would take over the services, but instead the tradition was forgotten." She lowered her head.

"Are you better now?" John asked.

"Yes, but I'm afraid I'm much too old to organize a memorial. I wish I could, though. My Edward deserves to be remembered."

John sat down on the bench next to the woman. "Who's Edward?"

Tears filled the old woman's eyes. "My husband. He died in battle, just months after we were married."

"I'm so sorry," Mom said.

"So he was a fallen soldier," John said. The old woman nodded, unable to speak. John put his hand on hers. "Could you tell me how to run the memorial service? I'd like to do it this year."

The old woman smiled. "You remind me of my Edward. He had the same gray eyes and curly brown hair."

Hearing that, John wanted to help more than ever. "Can we do it, Mom? Can we run the :
