Sam tapped his pencil against his blank paper and sighed.

“I’ll never be able to write this essay.”

“What’s wrong?” his mother asked, placing her hand on his shoulder. “You just have to write about what you did over summer vacation.”

Sam scrunched his forehead in thought. He and Eric had entered a bike competition, gone to an amusement park, and took Karate lessons. “I guess I could write about that stuff.” He shrugged, still not sure if his essay was going to impress his friends at school.

The next day, the class took turns reading their essays. Sam slunk down in his seat, hoping Mr. Matthews wouldn’t notice him. With only ten minutes left before lunch, Sam thought he was safe from having to read his essay.

“Sam, I think we have enough time to hear about your summer vacation,” Mr. Matthews said.
Sam gulped as he got up and walked to the front of the room with his paper in his hand. He didn’t take his eyes off the essay as he read it. When he was finished no one clapped or said anything. He slowly raised his eyes to see a bunch of hands in the air.

“Looks like you have some questions,” Mr. Matthews said. “I heard it was really scary.”

“Yeah. I begged my parents to take me, but they wouldn’t,” Vicki said.

As Sam answered question after question, he smiled. Before he knew it, it was time for lunch. On the way to the cafeteria, the questions continued.

“You’re so lucky,” Jake said. “I wish I did all that this summer.”

Sam smiled. He’d had an amazing summer after all.
